MOVIE NEWS

Upset Love Scene Upsets Miss Day

"I was never so embarrassed in my life," sighed Doris Day.

She was talking about an upset love scene with Gordon MacRae in "Tea for Two."

It happened like this:

MacRae—"Would you mind if I asked you a very personal question?"

Miss Day—"I really don't care if you do; in fact, I'll be very disappointed if you don't."

MacRae—"May I kiss you?"

Doris puckered up her pretty lips, leaned toward MacRae and then . . . ! Behind them on the set was a door. It burst open suddenly. Through it dashed a small, towheaded lad who ran to Doris and bellowed:

"Maw, I'm hungry! When do we eat?"

It was Doris' own son, Terry.

She brought him to the studio with her because it was a school holiday, then forgot he was there when Director David Butler, eager to get his romantics on film, worked well beyond the usual lunch hour with one take after another.

Magic Of Navajos Makes It Rain

William Keighley, the noted motion picture director, feels like shaking the hand of every Navajo medicine man in the state of New Mexico.

He told them he wanted a showery day for some storm sequences in "Rocky Mountain," all of which was filmed in the desert wilds near Gallup.

The medicine men said, "Ugh! Easy! Next week sure! Maybe even Monday."

"And it rained on Monday, too!" Keighley exulted, "and it kept right on raining as long as I needed it."

Rain in New Mexico during the drouthy season is worth about $1 a pint to the people who live there, and to Keighley it was worth even more than that.

Femme Philosophy

Says Doris Day "The average woman never has anything to wear nor space enough to keep it in."

* * *

Rodeo Clown Gets Whirl At The Movies

There's an interesting new screen personality in "Rocky Mountain."

His real name is Slim Pickens!

He stands a full six feet in his sox, and weighs 200 pounds.

He left home at the age of 15 to become a rider of killer broncos and even meaner Brahma bulls on the major rodeo show circuits of Canada and the western United States.

Later on, after years of experience and many broken bones, he turned to comedy and became a top-line attraction with his clowning and bull fighting skits.

He never dreamed, he says, of becoming a movie actor until just a few weeks ago, when William Keighley, noted director, caught him battling imaginary bulls in a rodeo show at Saugus, Calif., and promptly signed him up for a role in the Flynn picture.

Keighley describes Pickens as a "find" because of his great natural comedy sense.

Pickens says, "Wall, I dunno about that. Right now I'm still trying to wake up. But I do hope to make good, and I'm certainly gonna give this new business an awful whirl."

In the picture he plays the character known as "Plank," a weather-beaten plainsman serving with the Confederate patrol commanded by Flynn.

"He handled the part like he was born to it," says Director Keighley.

Ancient Pants!

For his role as the stellar villain in adventure thriller, "Raton Pass," Steve Cochran wears riding pants that adorned Humphrey Bogart in "The Oklahoma Kid," back in 1939! Cochran spotted them in the wardrobe department and refused to wear anything else. Said Steve: "I've always dreamed of stepping into Bogey's shoes some day. I'm only too happy to start with his pants."

It's Practically Impossible To Please Women

Gene Nelson, dancing star, was working up a dangerous caper for "Tea for Two" in Technicolor.

Mrs. Nelson, nee Miriam Franklin, was standing by to tell him what looked best and how to do it better. She's a dancer in her own right, and for years she has been Gene's combination partner, choreographer and critic.

Gene towed his face and marched to the bottom of a tall, curving staircase. After executing some hot licks on the first four steps, he leaped to the top of the newel post, a flat one, and then defied the law of gravity by running up the steep balustrade for about 25 feet!

He teetered dangerously, and waved his arms, but kept his feet and slid back down to the post, where he executed a dizzying pinwheel. Then he looked happily to Mrs. Nelson for words of praise.

"Oh, it was all right," said she, polishing a finger-nail, "but I think it needs more oomph. You should have put in a couple of extra beats before you made the leap, and you ought to run further up the balustrade before you start down."

Being a good husband or at least a knowing one, Mr. Nelson grinned, took a deep breath and started all over again.

"Eventually," he said, "you'll see this caper in the picture. If I live, that is."

Stand-In Stands In Upside Down

Until recently, Clint Carey, veteran movie stand-in, figured that he had done everything for stars except stand on his head.

Now he has done that for Greg McClure in "Breakthrough."

The scene called for McClure to stand on his head while French actress Suzanne Dalton admired him. Carey spent at least two hours on his noggin, off and on, while the cameramen and electricians arranged the shooting set-ups:

Hubby, Wife Appear As Hubby, Wife

Director William Keighley solved a major casting problem for "Rocky Mountain" in an unusually personal way.

He assigned the roles to himself and his wife, Genevieve Tobin, and they appear in the picture as a touring husband and wife who pause to examine a great stone marker reading: "Rocky Mountain." It's the opening scene in the story, which stars Errol Flynn as the leader of a gallant band of Confederate soldiers on secret mission in California.

The assignment was a lark for the Keighleys. The director hadn't worn greasepaint since his Broadway theater days. Miss Tobin, former stage and screen star, has devoted most of her attention to domesticity since she married Keighley.

Kisses on the Level

Ruth Roman had to wear lifts in her shoes for romantics with Gary Cooper in Technicolor adventure drama, "Dallas." Cooper stands six-foot-three while she's but five-foot-four. One of Cinemaland's unwritten laws is that "heroes" never stoop to kiss.
